Paris - April 29. '51 -

Dear Sizzie,

Think here I am in Paris, & my journal back in England a fortnight ago! Well before saying anything of the busy present I think it best to take up the past, & so return to a fortnight ago today! - Dr. Gray came home to an early lunch, & we took the omnibus into London to call on Mrs. Lawrence - I in the elegance of my new straw bonnet & white camel's hair. But I can't tell you how I begrudge wearing these things into London; it had been so smoky & the east wind so strong for the few last days as to blow the smoke somewhat even to Kew, & when you were in London itself it seemed like a dark cloud over everything, & it is painful to me to see the fresh whiteness disappearing under little 'blacks' as they call them - One face & collar can be washed again to be sure, but ones new ribbons cannot - And I scarcely ever wear my camel's hair into London for that reason - It is quite refreshing to get out to Kew again where the skies are so much clearer - I think I should be very discontented to live in London - Well: we got out at the corner & walked to Mrs. Lawrence's, & the servant said Mrs. Lawrence was not at home' but Dr. Gray said I must go in & wait while he went up to see Mr. Lawrence about his letters & passport - So I went into the library - After awhile Mrs. Lawrence came in, wrapped in a shawl, & looking very tired - She said she was taking advantage of the cessation of hostilities for Precision Park to have the house put in order, ^{the} as if she had been ^{as} looked very tired! told her I was very sorry she had come down, for I had no intention of seeing her, but as Dr. Gray & I were obliged to come together he must leave me somewhere while attending to business - But I felt very sorry, I must say, for I thought she would think me rude & hasty for having insisted on coming in, though she was very kind - One other English people have told us Mr. & Mrs. Lawrence were very much liked - They are always cordial & good-natured, they entertain, which none of our ministers have done before, that is so much & on so large a scale - And Mr. Lawrence always has a ready word on public occasions, & Mrs. Lawrence would not be thought to singular here as at home - And I am sure their countrymen ought to be satisfied, they are so heartily cordial & good-natured. It should think from all accounts, in their several attentions & kindness to Americans, they were a great contrast to Mr. & Mrs. Ross here, who are said to be exceedingly stiff & formal - And exclusive too - Well from Mrs. Lawrence's we went to the Vernon Gallery to pass the time until we met Mr. Thompson at the new palace of Westminster, in which Mr. Francis Falgrave had kindly given us one of Mr. Barry's tickets. ^{Mr. Barry is the architect} We walked from the Vernon Gallery above St. James Park, which is a pretty enclosure half as large as the Common I should think, & rejoiceing in a sheet of water over which you can be fished if you please, but I preferred walking round. The day was so cold & chilly that there was not much satisfaction in being out - We found Mr. Thompson waiting for us at Poet's Corner of Westminster Abbey, & we crossed over to Westminster Hall just as one of the Swiftest dashing carriages drew up, & they got into all their splendour of their all robes & thread lace. He went into Westminster Hall which is indeed very fine, with its beautiful oaken roof. One end they are now at work upon making an entrance into the Palace. The Court rooms are of Westminster Hall, & we passed into one too. The lawns looked very beautiful in their short boughs, & we did the rounds in their full beauty, walled fronts. Justice Jeffreys was one of the four judges in the first Assize we passed into, & I am sure no one would have picked him out with his dark red features & dull hard face as the author of it. In another Court more Baron Barke, the Chief Justice. Another, they had simple rooms like a rather decent morning room with wide sleeves & little round capes, the capes of a dull changeable silk, & the sleeves turned up with the same. And the huge steps coming down to their shrines. A woman was pleading her own cause here, and the way Baron Barke passed out his mouth & let the word slowly escape, & the other Just's listened with his chin resting on his hand, & his arms on the back in front, made one think of Justice Starkey in Pickwick - We did not stay long there, but went on to the workmen's side which adjoins to the Castle still unfinished of the Palace of Westminster, or New House of Parliament. We were admitted through the gate & then left to find our way about, through passages & sets of stone, workmen & milled. And it is a place where one might easily lose their way, for the building is situated according to no definite plan. I can reason why it should not be continued for miles & would the same. Hence - I am curious the architect of it. I have had no post news of it. But the plan is quite good after Court yard surrounded by buildings of much the same articular aspect, with occasionally a tower or something of the sort in the angles.

After some exploring we found our way up into the house of Commons. The room is not large, formerly had a much higher roof, but on top, they found it doomed so sound entirely & Mr. Baring was forced to put in a lower one in different style. It did not strike me as a handsomely proportioned room, & the whole building has the same fault, the effect is all wasted in details, & then the roof grand & imposing. There is too much ornament, too much carving. The room is still in a very unfinished state, though it was promised to the members after Easter. Then for examining minutely much of the carving is very beautiful & beautifully executed, but the windows are filled with stained glass most grotesque! See no reason why in a building which does not profess to be a restoration but only in the style of time passed, this should dominate the defects. And especially as such great & expensive buildings are in a perfect measure for destruction. I should think it best to turn things off to the present state of art without perpetuating barbarism. There is a fine gallery leading from the house of Commons to a centre hall, which will I think be the finest thing in the building in. It is octagonal, being interspersed with ceiling in one Court. In the other the gallery goes to this room of Commons, opposite the House of Lords, on one side the passage to Westminster Hall, opposite a grand staircase leading to Committee rooms, so

The library was a fine suite of rooms, for the dull looks of books bear a poor deal of ornament about. There was also a fine row of arched letters surrounding the House of Commons, a gallery upon gallery of long passages into which Committee rooms opened, & where one could walk miles; indeed much the greater part of the building was of these Committee rooms. Our hotel was only for the unfinished part so we could not get in to the House of Lords, & in traversing one of the long galleries a police-man stopped us as having passed beyond permitted bounds. But I got hardly tried of being on my feet, & at length do day concluded to come down stairs. But he has such a power for delaying the man at the gate kindly shelter my shoes & brushed my aces, which had got many a trace of dust, while Dr. Gray & Mr. Thorpe were even smiling their names in a big book. And then we took our ways to Thornton to dine in town & Dr. Gray & I to take an omnibus to Hove downwards to call on Mr. & Mrs. Moore. We walked from the train road some distance to their houses, but found them not at home. And when we got on the main road again, we walked on, hoping an omnibus would overtake us. Dr. Gray wanted to call on Dr. Alexander quite at the other end of Hove, & as we walked there was no bus called, he went down the street, the apartment being I should walk along my path to a bus if passed, & if he should not find Dr. A. at home he was to follow me easily to overtake me - I walked on, turning back once a short distance, to give Dr. Gray every chance of overtaking me, but as I saw nothing of him concluded he had found Dr. A. at home & so continued my way, looking out for the bus. None came that would do & as I waited, I passed for Tunbridge Green, but that was at least 2 miles short of my destination. On I kept & soon to fear that I must walk all the way. And then I reflected how late it was, & I feared it would be dark before I could get there. All at once came, & I began to quicken my steps, walking however close to a front window going in the same direction. Mr. was near New Bridge an omnibus was passed, which only went so far, but I thought it not worth the trouble of getting out & go for little way, & to the train I reached the bridge. I soon got past me using 7 small boats, for pleasure came in fact as I crossed New Common & my great relief & delight, pleasure to play came towards me.
It seems he with a short cut up another St. not finding Dr. A. at home, & in my turning back I missed him. He walked on, & seeing nothing of me, he passed I had got into a bus - & he walked swiftly home. He said he had staid when he appeared at the door alone, & he stared when I announced what he found nothing of me, & came without soon to start on his tale me when I left London to him. I should have been surprised, I should not have thought of Webster! But I think the little statement to get home before dark helped off the fatigue at the end - I am glad to tell you how many miles I walked, for you would not believe me!

Wednesday I felt somewhat tired & would have been glad to stay at home, but Lady Webster sent for us to dine at 6/2 - Mr. Thompson & themselves were all, & we had a very pleasant L. - My letters came Wednesday which I acknowledged that night - Thursday I was busy preparing things to go to Paris. And in the afternoon Uncle Charles suddenly arrived - He staid & dined with us, & told us about his Italian journey. He certainly saw a most wonderful number of places in so short a time, & stored his mind with pleasant memories, which I am sure will repay him for the then fatigue - He seemed to enjoy very much telling them over to us - He looked tired & sleepy from the journey the night before ^{but happy man had not been at all sea-sick} & And proposed to be off for Edinburgh next morn but we wanted him to stay & go right-seeing a little with us if he thought it worthwhile - Dr. Gray went into town with him, meaning to take him to the Royal Society, but found on getting to Dr. Batts there was none that evening, & Dr. Booth advised Uncle Charles to strongly h^d go at once to Edinburgh, that he decided to go off the next morn. I walked over to the Station with them, & it was a lovely L. soft & warm, & more spring like than anything we had had - I found a new walk coming back by the river side, quite charming. Friday was a lovely day again - But having some cold & no particular inducement I kept quiet & pealed the snow. writing, & it was quite an amusement to see the crowds pass the window - Being so upon the Richmond road I had the full advantage - The omnibuses were crowded, & double the usual number I should think - Then vehicles of every sort of trade from smart carriages down to donkey-carts, crammed full of men & women children & babies all going a pleasureing - The gardens were filled with crowds walking about Sir William told me afterwards there were 2,000! I came to the conclusion last day in England was much the same as last-day with us, & should be spent with an C Saturday Lady Webster sent for us to come & dine with Mr. Brown & Dr. Wallie who were to be there Dr. Gray had work over at the garden, & I went over about 1 to persuade him to take a stroll with me, it was so pleasant a day - just as we were leaving we heard a voice calling us, & saw Sir Wm. in a little lookout on the fence ~~gate~~ ^{gate} ~~wall~~ ^{wall} which separated ~~of~~ ^{from} the garden of the former director - He found our way to him through a gate in the wall, & then through such a queer little yard, & such a sort of wilderness or labyrinth! Mr. Brown & Dr. Wallie were with Sir Wm. ^{in the garden} he led us through the yard to the house where in one room are placed for the present such as have been sent home of Dr. Webster's collection, such heaps & heaps! & Sir Wm. said it was only about $\frac{1}{3}$! Dr. Gray left us when we came out, but I went with the other gentlemen to see a drawing made by a lady of some plant in the Palm tree - We ^{went to West Bank} ~~were to dine by 8 o'clock~~, & had a very pleasant dinner - Mr. Brown has been in poor health this winter & I thought & looked much older than when I saw him in Leyden last summer - But he brightened up occasionally & said dry, quiet things in his peculiar way - He certainly is very deficient in manly beauty! Dr. Wallie is a very amusing person - His English has a great deal of foreign accent, & the forcible & rather unusual use of words which a foreigner so often has - And his accounts of things are very extravagant & droll - His account of his likeness for which he has lately been sitting, & his wife's opinion of it, were very amusing - "Oh!" said he, "I am obliged to hide ~~the~~ under my books - Or my wife would burn all the copies I have! - When I was sitting to she saw that drawing, she said, Mrs. Maguire, Dr. Ballistic cried! Oh, said he, I can alter that; but the more he altered, the more I cried! & when it came home & my wife saw it, she cried, & said she was sure something was the matter with me & I was unhappy! - "Oh!" said Mr. Brown, "when you saw it I thought you were sneezing!"

Easter Sunday we had written to the Hards saying we would come over & dine with them & go to church - I therefore did not go to Kew church, preferring the afternoon service on Easter Sunday - Dr. Gray went alone & then we took our way to the station, getting to Clapham about 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ - But somehow we did not seem to be in time for service - Mrs. Hard had been ill again, & scarcely seemed fit to come out & see us (Mrs. Hard took us into the little garden to show us some cases he was preparing to send to the Exhibition; among others he sends the glass bottle which first suggested the idea to him, & in which the ferns have now been growing 17 years! & nothing done for them all that time!) He had a very pleasant meeting with them all, Stephen & his wife & Nat Hard were there too - It rained with rain after dinner, so we could not go out - And we had foolishly come without umbrellas; we sent for a fly, as we thought in good time for the 2.30 train, but the boy was forever, & we could only hope to reach the 9.30 - When we were about half way to the station, Dr. Gray discovered that he had put on the wrong coat, & in the pocket of his own were our return tickets! So, for a few days of the holidays, the same ticket! Let you go & return for a day - So new tickets must be bought, & when we got on the train to Barnes we found that the 8.30 was the last train which went to Kew, & this one went to Richmond! However it turned out better in the end, for we found a fly there which took us directly to our door - Monday we were up & off very early in the morning, for I had invited Miss Chollet's sister, M. Miss L. at Cambridge & niece of M. Guyot, a nice Madame, friend there in Paris, to come & pass a day of the Easter holidays with me; her school-mistress was to send her with a servant to the station, & I was to meet her there & accompany her to Kew - where we were back again at 10 o'clock - Having merely gone in & out again, & left Dr. Gray to accomplish some business in town - She is a pleasing young person, & I think enjoyed the day, for she scarcely knows a person out of her school connexions - She talks nothing but French, very few words of English, so I had a day's practice in the French language, & I think you could scarcely have heard anything more amusing than my attempts to explain things, when showing her round the garden & houses - We had a lovely morning when I went into London, & it was very pleasant when we first went into the garden, but clouds began to gather & as we came back to our lodgings about 1 o'clock to get some lunch, it began to rain; I looked at the ship before we might have fair weather, but as some more hopefully down, & at 6 o'clock we went under our umbrellas to look at the Museum; we dined at 5, & then Dr. Gray escorted Madde. into town in the omnibus again to St. John's wood, & so handsomer than at first. Mr. Knell did not reach home until 9/2 - Tuesday I was packing all day, things to take & things to leave for of course one cannot carry too much, though we have left one down stairs to stop money taking up. Wednesday I went up to lunch with the Hookers & bid them good-bye - They were very kind & cordial. And on leaving there Dr. Gray & I walked down to take the omnibus to Birmingham train to call on Mrs. Lupton & her daughter who had left cards upon us the week before - Dr.

Alexander came in while we were there at the Hookers & went with us to Birmingham station on his way to his own house - He is one of those who staid with us in Cambridge during the meeting of the scientific association, & is the first time I have been in England - Before I went to the Hookers my letters arrived, which I acknowledged last night - From mother from Eskan & from Lizzie - A delightful package - The rest of the day I spent more devoted to packing & clearing away - And Thursday in good time we took our way to the train, the luggage having been sent over before - So Mr. was not at home when we landed at the Hookers, & Dr. Gray went up in the omnibus & bid him good-bye, a little very anxious, but he sent our word he should certainly come down in the morning in time to see us - As we walked to the station we saw him coming down the lane - He joined us & kindly walked with us almost over to the train - A gentleman came up going in the same direction, whom Mr. introduced as Capt. Ballot, & who joined us & took seats with us in the same carriage; he is brother to Dr. Ballot of whom I have often, & as a naval Captain, & a true sailor, & frank & good-natured & merry - He has promised when we come back to take us to some of the shops in London - From the Waterloo station we took a cab with our luggage which had received some considerable addition in the shape of a large chest of plants Dr. Gray was taking over to Paris to study, to the London Bridge station where we took our tickets for Paris & our places in the car for Belle-Île - The train was very full & crowded - The day was lovely & everything looked so green & lovely about London, the trees in St. John's Park excepted, that I quite repudged leaving England - It was not so fine as we knew never in the foot-cab, but snails flying flowers were out & as we whistled by we got occasional peep into such charming land & of such banks of lace blue - We had nearly two hours to wait for the sailing of the steamer from Belle-Île, & we stopped at some soup for lunch & walked about the town, & then went on board the boat, where we had some amusement in watching the embarkation of some horses - The tide was a good deal out so the boat lay quite low; on the pier was a large crane working with some chains - Each horse was backed into a sort of box strongly bound with iron, iron bars arching over the horse's back, & then it was hoisted in front - The top was open so the horse had his head out & you could see his back; his head was secured by his halter fastened on the sides to these boxes were fastened by iron rings, strong chain which again once looked into the chain of the crane, & then the box being empty & the horse was gently lowered on deck - It was quite amazing to see the different behavior of the horses; some so startled, others taking it quite as a matter of course, & others looking so curiously about them when suspended in mid air - But generally they were very quiet - I counted them afterwards & found there were 18, least of all a great travelling barouche with trunk, boxes, carpet bags, &c. Strong about 3 packed in & about it with inconceivable difficulty, horse swinging down, kicking, as Dr. Gray said, when in mid air the some most unnatural animal - Then we a great many little events the day was so fine; but I fell almost soon & should be sick, for I had not felt quite well the last day or two - However I had prepared myself with the new fashioned remedy, a toll strapped tight round my waist, & the sea was beautifully calm, so all my anticipations were most agreeably失望 - The coast of England is very picturesque the white chalk being so very looking & the cliffs very bold & high; we could see Dover & Shakespeare's cliff, as it is called - The coast of France is also much more bold than I had imagined - In truth we had a very pleasant voyage, & I have nothing more sweet to record than that sitting under the shade I sit very contently - We reached Boulogne about 3 P.M., having passed through the Customhouse about 3 P.M., & having shaken out a most travelling bag searched, we repaired to the houses by the baggage platform for Paris for the moment to you at once - We fell at once into the tender mercies of a commissionaire, who advised Dr. Gray to put me into the omnibus for the omnibus so far, to wait while they brought out the luggage & then I waited a little, & amusing myself with watching the looks of the passengers, & the peasant women in their white caps & heavy wooden shoes which their short petticoats seemed to disgrace, the women in their houses, the ~~hostess~~ - with light red caps, & points of soldiers in their frightfully ugly uniforms - After an hour the bus for Paris duly prepared & despatched to the railway, & then Dr. Gray & another passenger having taken their places in the omnibus, we made slow progress in the same direction - We did not find a restaurant as we expected at the station but only a cafe - So we walked back into the town & went in to have at one of these hotels, ordering a dish or two as in the restaurant - At 9 we were established in the car for night ride to Paris & took off my bonnet & wrapped my head in a mantle & folded a large shawl about me, Dr. Gray took another & as the French carriage we lay sleeping & housed in a side & divided by an iron in the middle, we taking one seat & affording the one of broad flat very comfortable lounge & some good naps. There were only two ladies besides ourselves in our carriage, until stopping at one place about 3 o'clock, & men were put in, & after that one of Conde had not so much down, & I did not sleep much.

But as we drew near Paris I was interested in seeing the face of the country, it looks so very differently from England! It has not that air of perfect cultivation & trim order. But the spring was even farther advanced, for the trees were more out. We reached Paris about 5 & had a most civil examination at the custom-house, they merely looked into the trunk, did not even open the bags & valise, & asking Dr. Gray if his chest contained anything but dried plants, locked them up again & let us go. We decided to go to Meurice while the Dowells should be in Paris, & take our lodgings later, so we got there by 6 or soon after, & ringing the concierge were ushered up 5 flights of stairs, when we found a pretty enough salon & bed-chamber adjoining, & the first thing I did was to undress & go to bed for a couple of hours; we were up to breakfast, ^{already} Cafe au lait & a roll, some time about 10, & then called out to see Aunt Lizzie, whom we found in the midst of packing. There Dr. Gray left me while he went over to the Jardin des Plantes. And I passed the time until he came back helping her & talking over the many things packed. They all seemed very well & bright. He went back to our hotel about 3, for I was tired enough to be glad to rest; we dined at Table d'Hôte about 5 1/2 & then ordered some fire for it was very chilly. In hotels in Paris they bring you up wood worth so much, & you burn that up as you please, & then order more. Thus paying by the stick as it were. Saturday Lizzie was so kind as to go with me to choose a dress & a mantilla. I got a mantilla which changes brown & black, there is not much silk in it, but it has a fringe, about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a yard deep on the lower portion, of sewing-silk a little crimped, & it is soon quite off on the shoulders, showing the high-necked dress above;  there! isn't that as good as a fashion-plate? - It is very jaunty & stylish  looking, & I mean to have an under-jacket made to match for colder weather  I looked about for an every-day dress, but the fashion is too gay for my taste, such tight stony bunches of flowers on high colored grounds; so I asked for something more quiet, so we were shown some handsome plaids of two colors, & some cheaper clamped ones in small calico patterns; economy prevailed for the moment over taste, & I chose the cheaper. We dined with Aunt Lizzie & met Mr. Lawrence with his two boys whom he was to carry back with him to America, they having been at boarding-school here in Paris. The evening passed so pleasantly that I had Uncle George's mother for company, who was the most present at a social gathering. no idea it was so late before we went - almost 11 o'clock. Sunday morn. we proposed to be all ready to go to church & breakfast on our way up at the foot of our 5 flights; but on getting down we could see nothing of coffee-room, the house was at work in the calle à maçon, & there was no one to point the way, so we decided to try a cafe. It was a chilly day, threatening rain, & looking into several windows didn't do not quite please us, we found our way to the Palais National, & were tempted by the Café Berg. I confess it feels rather awkward on first entering this great room, filled with little tables, & seeing myself on every side reflected by mirrors; the attention of the waiters was at first overpowering, but one soon gets quite used & takes everything as a matter of course. We had each a cup of nice Café au lait, one of those delicious, delicate French soûls almost half a yard long & about as large as a man's wrist, & the sweet butter. When we had finished we took our way to the Bratine where we were in very good time for service. Mr. Grand Siècle preached, but I could not follow him so well as when I heard French preaching in the winter. It takes a little time to get up one's habits of following. After church it rained hard & we hurried back in the wet. After dinner we went on to Aunt Lizzie's & spent the Eo. with them. Monday morn. Dr. Gray & I set off early to go look for apartments, & having taken some addresses from a broker, set off first for the other side of the river, for if we could get a good situation near the Jardin des Plantes & also where I could walk alone it would be more convenient. He went exploring wherever notices to let were hung out, if the house looked nice; we mounted once an Quatrième, & were shown blank rooms, as in my question then I had forgotten to add "meuble." He found two pleasant rooms looking out charmingly upon the gardens of the Luxembourg, but alas! they would not be vacant until the 5th. of May, & that would be too late; they were filled with the books &c of some students, one "in England" who I thought might be amused could they know how we had been exploring in their private abodes — so finding nothing that seemed to be right we decided to come back & try one on this side the river which was recommended as being near the Boulevards the Tuilleries & the Champs Elysées where I could amuse myself when Dr. Gray was away. So we found our way to No. 9 Rue Vieille du Temple, the Concierge directing us, "dernière porte au gauche, au second!" we ascended a rung, & were ushered into a pretty enough French saloon. After waiting a moment or two Madame issued from one of the great doors, evidently just out of bed in a dressing-gown & slippers & bidden us to come again in half an hour, as the room "n'est pas fait;" & she could not show us, especially to Monsieur disarranged! — So we retraced our steps — meantime the landlord had been sent home & Dr. Gray's judgment on it was, that it was pretty when closely examined, but at a little distance looked like a bd. Calico. My own opinion of it did not improve, so we carried it in for Aunt Lizzie's judgment, & as she said the same thing & thought it never would look like anything, taste got the victory over economy & I decided to change it if possible for the blue plaid, so Dr. Gray went with me & they were very obliging & changed it at once. And the new one ^{was} met with universal approbation — Then I went with Dr. Gray to his tailor's, & then we took our way again to numero 9. Madame was quite ready to receive us & showed us the rooms of which we were to take our choice; "Voila!" the ante-chamber, which taking the long divan from the Salon & putting it in place of the buffet & with some rearrangements would make the Salon, & the salon could receive a bed & a wash-stand, "voila, that's complete!" On the chamber where Madame was sitting, furnished French style as a chamber with a little closet for a dressing-room, & leading by a long dark passage to another dark little room which could be used as a Salon; we preferred the salon chamber, which we were to take for 100 francs a month paid in advance, & 12 francs more for the concierge & the bonne who takes care of the rooms. When we pleased, we were to have our breakfast at the price of the restaurator, & Madame to furnish lights & fire. For dinner we were to dine at the Cafés - So all was settled & we were to come the next Evening - After dinner we went in to pass the evening with Aunt Lizzie who was to be off for Nantes early the next morning - They meant to be back Saturday Evening to see the great fete Sunday, & to take the final departure for London the next week - Sophie & Henrietta were left in charge, & the rest of the establishment dismissed - Tuesday I spent waiting for the dress-maître to alter my dress before dinner for I should have said on Saturday we expected Mr. Webb, a friend of Dr. Gray ^{an English} resident in Paris, to call - And when we waited until the last moment, thinking we should be late for dinner & he could not be coming, as we opened the door to put out the candle before it - he accompanied us a few steps, & invited us to dine there Tuesday at 6½ - So I wanted my dress which set badly, changed before then - But the woman never came until 12, & that was hopeless - I wrote & packed & made ready for our removal, for we meant to take our things & leave them at Mme. Lacoste's as we went to dine, & go there to sleep - Dr. Gray made a visit round there in the afternoon & reported all things ready - But for the dinner a first experience of French lodgings I must wait until the next letter -

I am finishing my letter Tuesday, May 6th. to sail by the Franklin tomorrow. The Lowells leave early tomorrow morning for London where they stay a fortnight, & then return ^{to the continent} for their summer's travel through Germany, Switzerland, to Greece, Syria & Egypt & back to Rome for the winter, though their plans are not entirely decided - I must thank Sue, Charlie & John for letters last week - And with fondest love to all I send ever most affectionately, Jane -
