INTRODUCTION.

In compiling this list the assertion is not made that no birds other than those mentioned breed in this State. These records cover the period from 1890 to 1908, and have been gathered from reliable sources.

When making up this little book it was not considered advisable to accept hearsay evidence, nor to give credence to the records of any but those who are intimately acquainted with the habits of Rhode Island Birds.

Many birds are locally known by erroneous names. The Screech Owl, because it has long ear tufts, and also, as it frequently takes refuge in barns, is often called both "Long-eared Owl" and "Barn Owl." The Chipping Sparrow, which nests in trees, is called "Tree Sparrow," and the Flicker, owing to the red patch on the back of its head, is called "Red-headed Woodpecker." Many other local names, too numerous to mention, are used and it can readily be seen that such records require careful investigation. The fact that adult birds, or young able to fly, have been seen during the breeding season, does not necessarily constitute a nesting record.

This is not a history of Rhode Island Birds, and no descriptions of birds, nests, or habits have been attempted. Only a list of the common and scientific names with a single nesting data for each has been given; and data have been used, for the most part, where more than one party have seen the nest in question. The letters A. O. U. and the number before the name of each species, refer to the check list of North American Birds of the American Ornithologists Union.

The greatest thanks is extended to those who have allowed the use of their records, but especially to John H. Flanagan (former Chairman of the Rhode Island Bird Commission), and Thomas L. Flanagan of Providence, who rank among the highest authorities on Rhode Island Birds, having established many breeding records; notably the Great Horned Owl and Long-eared Owl, two of the rarest nesters in this State.

This book is not an official report, and is published (in a limited number) at the personal expense of the Commission.
