PATRICIAN DAHLIA BULBS

The roots I dug from last year's garden,
How dry and mummy-like they are;
Ugly things, hugging little clods of crumbling earth
In their withered, shrunken arms,
Like mementoes of the past.
I deeply bury them from sight
And over them heap the soil;
No longer shall their ugliness offend,
Nor shall they see the light of day;
I shall forget them.
I find a stalk of tender green with bud

Unclosing to a glorious flower:
Can it be, within their withered hearts
The bulbs were holding, as in sanctuary,
A germ that waited but the call
To resurrection and to life?
This miracle of bulb and flower
Is like a flash of unexpected smile
From one of cold and stern exterior;
Or like old age, whose beauty, dead and withered
Still holds the flower of youthful cheer
When living in the hope of the Eternal.

A MOTOR TRIP TO THESE SHOW GARDENS
"PERHAPS THE MOST BEAUTIFUL IN AMERICA"
WILL BE WELL WORTH WHILE

PATRICIAN DAHLIAS

In stately rows, the regal dahlias stand,
And seem a close inspection to invite;
With heads uplifted loftily and firm,
Commanding admiration as their right.

An artist, with a living brush, has touched
Each petal with the colors that adorn;
With fiery sunset hues of Golden West,
And palest blush-tints of the rosy dawn.

How prodigal His brush with pigment, rich;
He uses gold and bronze without stint.
Then blends and softens all with finished touch
And leaves each petal stamped with His imprint.

How beautiful the raiment that He shades;
The royal purple, velvety, we view;
Proud Kings and Queens and Emperors in line,
Majestic, with their gorgeous retinue.

He paints, as white as Snowdrift's purity,
An avalanche of petals, chaste and cold,
Then opening them slowly, one by one,
Uncovered hearts that glow with sunkissed gold.

How deftly has He drawn from uncouth bulb,
Fair, dainty maids of high degree and charm;
Bold Kalifs of reputed dark red blood,
And tall Ambassadors so straight and calm.

Like brilliant sunburst breaking on the sight
In vivid streaks and rays, the dahlias stand,
Proclaiming, silently, their royal birth,
Creations of the Master Artist hand.
