Some Gladioli are wonderful when well grown, while the same varieties poorly grown may look very ordinary and commonplace. A few kinds may be beautiful in any condition owing to their color, etc., but all varieties are far superior when well grown. So it pays to grow your glads well.

Cultural Hints

Gladiolus bulbs give the best results when planted in the spring after danger of frost is over. Plant bulbs from four to six inches deep in well prepared soil. Plant deeper in light soil than in heavy. They thrive best in sunny places although for later plantings and where summers are real warm they will produce better bloom in a partially shaded location. An application of manure or commercial fertilizer when plants are several inches high and plenty of water through the growing season will produce finer flowers and taller spikes. After blooming continue to water them for a while to make better bulbs. Dig when top starts to die down.

Plant large bulbs to secure the best bloom. A large bulb usually produces two or three spikes of bloom, sometimes more. A medium size bulb will give one good spike and occasionally two, and blooms later than the larger one. All orders are filled with large bulbs only, unless medium sizes are requested.

Complete Cultural direction will be sent upon request.

My bulbs are well known for their quality, trueness to name and for the beautiful blooms they produce.

During 1930 blooms from my plantings won many awards at various shows in Southern California.
