SUGGESTIONS

FOR THE

Building of Steeplechase Courses

As will be noticed in the accompanying photographs, two methods have been accepted by the Stewards of the National Steeplechase and Hunt Association for the construction of the guard-rails or supports used for the retention of the brush, namely a rail (see Plates IV. and VII.) and an inclined board box (see Plate VI.). While the former is the cheaper and the form generally adopted, the board construction is the stronger and less expensive to maintain. The boards should be not less than two inches thick.

The brush should be of some stiff variety—cedar or spruce are best. If a lighter brush has to be used it is well to tie it up in fagots and to fill the cases with them. Care must, however, be used to see, on the completion of the fence, that no cord or wire has been left above the rail or support.

After the frames are full, the brush should be evenly trimmed off with a pair of hedge shears and slightly rounded on the “take off” side.

The guard-rail at the Liverpool may be made solid to the ground. This should always be done when the “take-off” is soft or liable to break away. The plank used should be two feet wide, of which six inches buried in the ground, and slanted towards the jump.

The Water Jump should be concreted to within a foot or eighteen inches of its lip and the remaining portion puddled with clay.

No ditch need be concreted.

The Bank Jump (Fly Bank) should be constructed as in Plate II., the box to hold the brush not being over three feet high and the earth and sod banked and sloped to the height desired.

The Wings should be much higher than the jumps, so that a horse may not be tempted to take them. The post nearest to the fence must be well planted in the ground, but the one at the end of the wing may be less secure, so that should a horse bolt out and break it down the danger of accident may be lessened.
