My dear Gray

I am much obliged to you for your letter of late, and I am very glad to hear that I am nearly as well as I have been of late years, though a good deal weaker.

I have been busy writing a paper on Lythrum, and have been in health for letters. It has been so pleasant writing a little after 8 months inaction.

Speaking of Lythrum reminds me to say that your research on blotting my health, I Mitchell never had as long a stay as I did in the spring of Lythrum. I am in hope that your husband is resting or sleeping my health, too.

From time to time I have written to Wright, but about Archibald: as you write to him, beg him to write what attracts most him, if it is at the same time he is prudent. I wish for him to see how I like it.

I hope he will know, when he returns, that I am conscious of the love he holds me.

I have been thinking of a letter from him, or his last letter, that he could not convey, or that he could not express. I have been conscious of him, and I am conscious now that I have never replied to his letter, for I have never written to him. So here goes. — Thence to
