

Thanking you for your kind interest. I remain,

Yours faithfully,

C. G. Tringle.

Charlotte, Vermont.

7. July, 1889.

Dear Dr. Gray,

I was about-to write you, when your kind note of yesterday was handed me. I had in mind to write you all the while I was in Mexico; but I was not-informed of your return to Cambridge till shortly before I left there.

I arrived in the city of Chihuahua, and established my base there, the day before you passed there (as I learned from a railroad conductor.) I had not-been at work there a month when, as I was negotiating for a mule-train and escort-for a journey of 500 miles through the Sierra Madre, where the fever, which I contracted in Orizaba last-year returned. Judging it-impudent-to get-far from medical aid, I continued to work near the line of the railroad, which I followed north as far as Aguas Calientes. Each attack of my fever weakened me more and more, and, when the country became parched with the usual June drought, and small pox was everywhere prevalent, I thought-I would come home for rest, for treatment for my fever, and for safe revaccination.

I am led to hope I shall get-thoroughly rid of my fever and recover from its effects in a few weeks, so I may return to my field with full strength and courage. It is not, I believe, an unhealthy region, and I mean not-to carry there again the seeds of fever.

But I found it-the hardest region to work ever visited by me. No winter and spring rains of any account, and few plants in growth except within restricted limits widely separated.

I secured 175 species for my 50 sets, and perhaps an equal number of species represented by only a few specimens.

I left-abruptly upon hearing of the death in the city of one of my best-friends there (a young missionary) from small pox (my office was at-the railroad station) ~~that~~. I did not take out specimens to send to you. I trust-my collection will arrive before I leave, so I may attend to this.
